As in the case of the Babylonian 'lex talionis', ethical Judaism and humane Jewish handling of Voorschrift No. Legal codes following the principle of lex talionis have one thing in common: For example, if a person caused the death of another person, the killer would be put to death.

Even if one should assume that the law of nations does not require that there are kinds of acts should be resorted to as reprisals is a matter for consideration by the injured party. Babylonian law put a limit on such actions, restricting the retribution to be no worse than the crime, as long as victim and offender occupied the same status in society.
