Those now in positions of power and Community in Kenya address the problems of widows are people with positions in national politics, positions with too many complicated responsibilities for appropriate and urgent action, because those concerned are not "real good men. Her Family ethnography, drawn on interviews with 50 widows for a year, is carefully contextualized with archival research providing the reader with a more fully realized social world than most anthropologists describe at the same time describing people, even the deceased, more alive than most historians achieve.
