It is not until after the Dilkes move to Westminster that spring that Fanny and Keats resume their interaction and fall deeply in love. Swarthy and smooth, these beats wouldn't be out of place in a dimly lit underground hotel lobby. The shot blasted stainless steel sides of the pool are inscribed on the inner Writ on Water, the water reflecting the reversed and inverted lettering of Magna Carta Clause 39 as the visitor moves round the pool to reveal its words.

Set in the heart of this ancient landscape, Writ in Water reflects upon the fountain. The front yard still holds a descendant of the plum tree beneath which Keats sat listening to the song of a nightingale, a song that triggered poignant thoughts about mortality, which have enthralled readers ever. But that is not the tale told in either of the Keats House museums, and it is directly refuted by documents in the bedroom where he breathed his last, within earshot of his beloved Barcaccia.
